Writing a winning cover letter

How to write a cover letter for a job application

Competition for jobs can be tough and your job application needs to stand out. At times, employers may deal with hundreds of applications for the one position.

Whether you are writing a letter of application in answer to a job advertisement, or just searching for work that has not been advertised, the objective is the same – to get an interview!

Cover letters are an important part of the whole package that you send to the employer. It is likely to be the first correspondence you will have with an employer on which he/she will be able to judge you, so it's your chance to make a great first impression.

Although your resume will outline your relevant work history, qualifications, dates and specific details about your skills and experience – the cover letter introduces you. It explains your motivations for seeking the position and provides summary information about your skills and experience.

Cover letters are a useful way to 'fill in the gaps' that may be present if an employer only reads your resume. For example, your cover letter can explain things like: interstate relocation, career change, periods of unemployment and other details that may be unclear from reading your resume alone.

Example cover letters

The following example cover letters provide a reference for you to use when writing application letters.

Make sure you tailor your letter to each job application.

Employers look for what you can do for them — your letter, along with your resume, is your opportunity to show them what you have to offer. A generic letter sent with all of your job applications is a lost opportunity.
